- Improved quality of service
- A reduction in negative encounters and events
- The creation of community of safety, health, wellness, recovery, and empowerment
- An increase in productivity, job satisfaction, and enhanced workplace environment

TRAUMA LENS

The training fosters an understanding of people that shifts away from the more stigmatizing and shame-inducing, “what’s wrong with you?” to a more compassionate and accurate “what’s happened to you ?” and, most importantly, to “what is possible in terms of healing and moving forward?” This lens promotes the recognition that people become hard-wired and primed to react unconsciously in self-protection, in either rigid/ constricted or chaotic ways in anticipation of threat or pain, as opposed to how they might want to respond. Adopting a trauma lens means that we understand that it is not that people don’t want to respond a certain way or change certain behaviours, but that they can’t at the present moment without the proper internal skills and supports in place.

This perspective recognizes the trauma is co-morbid with and masquerades as a number of other mental and physical issues, and that a core awareness of its differential diagnoses is crucial in order to ensure effective assessment and treatment planning. A trauma lens also emphasizes the importance of slowing down the pace of treatment to allow for the safe, titrated externalized expression and completion of self-protective emotional and motor responses, and for the development of self-regulation, containment, embodied presence, identity development and agency. Herman (1997) indicates that working with complex trauma can be challenging due to its oscillating and dialectical nature, and that a comprehensive awareness of trauma and its impact should be known before engaging in trauma interventions. While this is certainly true for trauma-specific practices and practitioners, holding an understanding of the neurobiology of trauma and attachment is just as important for people and organizations that are not providing trauma treatment but are still wishing to become trauma-informed.
